I think I've got a manageable form of a manuscript. It would have 6 tables and 3 figures. Supplemental Material has the details of the lit search and evaluation, with two tables describing the evaluation criteria. I would take out the big long table of every study in the supplemental material, but make sure that any details relating to the evaluation criteria are in the tables in the main file (which have been reformatted to just have design and evaluation details, but not results because the results are presented in the figures.

I am going to go shovel. And then walk to the store in search of milk.
